Dear Supervisors,

My name is Jason Norelli, I live in SF D5, and I am with Glide Harm Reduction in the Tenderloin. I urge you to support the opening of overdose prevention sites as a partial solution to the overdose crisis. Having multiple locations will allow more people to access associated services, save more lives, and make a more noticeable impact on public drug consumption.

This issue is important to me because I am a person in over 20 years of recovery from problematic substance use and know that a safe place to use drugs would have been a great help to me (and people like me) as I was struggling with the consequences of living in this challenging way. I think that it is transformative for people to be met with compassion and non-coercive responses as they endeavor to reach out for help. After many years of service, I see drug use is a symptom of larger issues that take a degree of trust to work on with folks.

We are in the midst of a dramatic and historic rise in drug overdose deaths. In 2020 and 2021, more than 1,300 people died of an overdose in San Francisco – nearly twice the number of people who died of COVID-19. The persistence and severity of the drug overdose crisis requires innovative and user-centered strategies to prevent deaths and reduce additional attendant harms, while expanding access to evidence-based treatment.

Overdose prevention sites allow people who use drugs to do so in a safe and clean environment, be treated with dignity and respect, and access supportive services, while reducing the traumas associated with public drug use. There has never been a single overdose fatality at any overdose prevention site worldwide.

The overdose crisis is a clear threat to the lives and welfare of the citizens of the City and County of San Francisco, causing the deaths of two San Franciscans a day, on average. Please, support the implementation of overdose prevention sites to address the overdose crisis in our city immediately.

In loving service,

Jason Norelli
